 New Listserv on Community-Based Participatory Research (CBPR) & Research Ethics! CCPH has launched a new listserv (electronic discussion group) on the topic of CBPR & Research Ethics. It was created to continue the dialogue initiated by the Educational Conference Call Series on Institutional Review Boards & Ethical Issues in Research. Feedback from call participants indicated strong interest in starting this listserv as a means for collaborative problem-solving and information sharing around ethical issues that arise in CBPR and challenges encountered in the process of research ethics review. We invite you to pose questions and share information or resources related to these topics!

To subscribe to the listserv, visit: <https://mailman1.u.washington.edu/mailman/listinfo/ccph-ethics>.

For more information, including transcripts and handouts from the call series, visit the CBPR & Research Ethics Webpage at <http://depts.washington.edu/ccph/irbhome.html>

 New CCPH Featured Member ~ Anthony Fleg! CCPH member Anthony Fleg is a medical student at University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. In his interview, Anthony discusses his effort to create an honest, healing partnership between American Indian communities and health professions students through the Native Health Initiative (NHI) in North Carolina. He believes that because of inequities in health care and health services, America's Indigenous peoples, and other marginalized communities, "suffer more, live sicker and die younger than other American citizens." Anthony explains how NHI is addressing these inequities not only through the creation of community-academic partnerships but also through a unique approach of promoting "an ethic of love and generosity to mobilize resources for social justice."
