The California longshoremen are back to work after a nearly three-month strike. The Pacific Coast longshoremen's strike was settled after a deal was reached between the International Longshoremen's Association and the employers.

The strike began in November due to a dispute over wage and benefit negotiations. The longshoremen demanded better working conditions and higher wages, while the employers offered a counterproposal.

After months of negotiations and mediation, a settlement was reached on February 15th. The terms include a 10% wage increase, improved health benefits, and a one-time bonus for striking workers.

The return to work comes as a relief for both the longshoremen and the employers. The strike had caused significant delays and disruptions in the port operations, affecting not only the longshoremen but also the businesses and industries依赖于 these ports.

The settlement is a victory for the longshoremen, who have been fighting for better working conditions and fair wages for a long time. However, the employers are also relieved to have their operations back to normal.

The Pacific Coast longshoremen's strike was a major event in the labor movement of the 20th century. Its resolution marks a new chapter in the ongoing struggle for workers' rights and fair treatment in the workplace.
