ORGANIZED LABOR

URGE STATE AID IN SAFETY WORK

Seattle Metal Trades Council Would Maintain Practice Dropped by Government.

DISAPPOINTED in the hope that the United States Shipping Board might be induced to reconsider its recently announced plan to discontinue with the end of the war its supervision of safety first work in local shipyards, the Seattle Metal Trades Council, the central body of the eighteen local unions of shipyard workers, went on record at a meeting held yesterday afternoon as requesting the state labor department to take up the task of accident prevention.

With this end in view the council voted to send a letter to Gov. Ernest Lister to appoint R. E. Warren, who has been head of the government accident prevention work in the shipyards, to be a safety first inspector for the state labor department in order that he may continue to carry on the work he has been doing for the United States Shipping Board.

It was further voted to appoint a committee of three to interview the governor and other state officials to urge the vital importance to the workers of the system of accident prevention Warren has perfected, and to request the state to take over the work the government is about to abandon.

Power Would Be Greater.

Warren, whose appointment to supervise the safety first campaign in the shipyards was due largely to backing of the council and who as a delegate to the council has had the cooperation of that body in perfecting his system of accident prevention, gave the state control plan his hearty indorsement, and declared his belief that it would give even better results than federal control, since the state would have power to enforce its orders, while the Shipping Board had only advisory powers.

Warren reported that his office as an employe of the Shipping Board had been abolished and that he would quit the government employ on January 1. He added, however, that he had requested the safety first men who have been working under him, and who have been paid by the employers and not by the government, to remain on their jobs until the employers gave them orders to the contrary, and that he was hopeful that the employers generally would retain them to do the same work as in the past.

Says Yards Will Keep Men.

Bert Swain, the council's secretary, made a similar report, saying that several of the big shipbuilding companies had strongly denied reports that they intended to discharge their safety first men and had expressed a desire to see the service continued by the government.

That the Shipping Board would not reconsider its plan to cease supervision of the safety first work in the shipyards was told the council in a telegram, in answer to one sent Charles Piez, head of the board, stating that the government was abandoning the accident prevention work since it had been undertaken only as a war measure, and must cease with other like activities of the government with the end of the war.

The council's meeting was held specially to dispose of business accumulated as a result of the omission of the regular meeting scheduled for Christmas eve, and a number of matters of large importance to the metal trades were taken up.

Would Aid Employment.

Among other things the council took a stand for proportionate representation of organized labor on the committee the King County Council of Defense, in conjunction with other organizations, is forming to obtain employment for returned soldiers at Camp Lewis through the United States employment service. Requested in a letter from the defense council to name a member of the committee, the council voted to notify the defense council that while it approved of its purposes, it was opposed to the appointment of a committee consisting largely of persons not directly interested in the problem of the returned soldiers and sailors and would cooperate only on the condition that the "working class be given equal representation on the committee with the employing class."

S. L. Boddy of the steam engineers told of an investigation he had made of the plan of the Defense Council and criticized the system mapped out to be followed at Camp Lewis as unsympathetic and lacking in recognition of the working class as a whole. He told the council that the government intended to demobilize at Camp Lewis all soldier, enlisted men west of the Dakotas, and urged that in view of the enormous number of men who would be released to go into the industries on Puget Sound, the council take steps to protect labor's interests.

In this connection the council indorsed and recommended to its affiliated unions a plan proposed by a resolution from the shipyard laborers, riggers and fasteners' local union and adopted by that organization, to remit the usual initiation fee to discharged soldiers and sailors, accepting the discharge papers of the returned fighting man as equivalent to a transfer card from another union.

Frank Turco of the blacksmiths, chairman of the meeting, reported that his union had already adopted such a plan and was admitting the discharged men to membership for a nominal fee of $1.50.

Clash Expected.

That the Central Labor Council and the Metal Trades Council are due for a clash on city politics in the near future was revealed in the discussion of a request from the outside electrical workers' local union, an unaffiliated organization, asking an indorsement of Charles Gallant, a union electrical worker employed by the city light department, as a candidate for the city council. Instead of indorsing Gallant the council jumped into the political arena by nominating candidates of its own.

S. L. Body of the steam engineers, made the suggestion and was backed in it by a member of the same union, A. E. Miller, chairman of the council's conference committee, who moved that John E. Mullane of the plumbers, who was recently a labor candidate for county commissioner, be requested to file for the city council as the candidate of the metal trades. Mullane was present at the meeting and was forthwith called upon by Boddy to say whether he would make the race.

Mullane said he would, but only on the condition that he was assured the support of the metal trades, and, second, that of unions outside of the metal trades.

"I am willing to pledge myself in this case to go to the City Council as the representative of the workers only and to place my resignation in the hands of this council before I take the office, but I want labor's support. I haven't the time or the money to spend in running for exercise," said Mullane.

Present Candidates Panned.

The fact that R. L. Proctor, president, and Ed T. Levi, vice president, of the Central Labor Council have both filed for the City Council was touched upon in a debate of the plan to indorse Mullane and criticism was expressed of the action of the two in filing as labor candidates without the indorsement of the Labor Council.

Debaters declared that it was the intention of the Central Labor Council to indorse both Proctor and Levi and metal trades delegates to the Central Labor Council were urged to attend the council's meeting Tuesday night to make a fight for Mullane's indorsement as a candidate picked by labor and not one seeking labor indorsement after filing.

By amendment of the original motion the council also voted to ask Hulet M. Wells, formerly of the outside electrical workers, but more recently a shipyard worker, to file as Mullane's running mate.

The council voted to approve the action of its board of business agents in sanctioning a strike of about 200 members of various shipyard unions at the Hartzell marine ways and shipbuilding and repair plant at Winslow, which is in the Seattle jurisdiction. A representative of the strikers informed the council that the men had walked out yesterday morning at 11 o'clock following the refusal of the management to rescind a posted order placing in effect the wage scale recently promulgated through the Macy Shipyard Wage Adjustment Board, representing the United States Shipping Board.

Men Doubt Assertion.

The company, he said, has defended its action, claiming that the United States Shipping Board had ordered the new scale put into effect though it meant a reduction in wages for nearly every man in the plant. The company, he said, had not produced documentary evidence to prove this assertion, of which the strikers were inclined to doubt the truth.

The council went on record as instructing its affiliated unions not to permit their members to do repair work on any ships sent away from the Hartzell plant during the strike. Notices of this intention to back the strike by preventing a transfer of work was ordered sent to the United States Shipping Board and also to all employers in the Seattle jurisdiction and to all loyal metal trades councils on the Sound and elsewhere. A telegram was also ordered sent the United States Shipping Board demanding an explanation of the charge that the board had itself ordered a wage reduction in violation of the Macy award.

Several other grievances reported against the Hartzell company were referred to the special convention of the Pacific Coast Metal Trades Council to be held in Portland on January 6.

Reporting for the conference committee, of which he is chairman, A. E. Miller called attention to the growing unrest in the 100 shipyard contract shops of Seattle over the Macy award and suggested that a definite plan of dealing with the situation be mapped out and blanket agreements of the council's own drafting presented, demanding wages and working conditions suitable to the unions interested, and that drastic action be taken to enforce such demands.

A motion indorsing the suggestion was carried and the conference committee was instructed to map out a program.

The contract shops do not come under the Macy shipyard wage award, but wage negotiations with them have been held up by the council pending some settlement of the controversy over that award.

JEAN CAMERON to interpret Scotch songs and dances at Belgian New Year's Eve ball.

IN accordance with the customs of their native land the Belgians of the city will celebrate New Year's Eve with a ball and entertainment given under auspices of the Belgian American Relief Association in the Recital Hall, Odd Fellows Temple, 915 E. Pine St.

This is the first time in five years that the Belgians of the city have celebrated, according to Mrs. Maria Vanden Wyer, president of the association. New Year is the time of holiday festivities in Belgium, as Christmas is a day of more solemn observance.

At the New Year's Eve ball several features have been planned, among which are the "Dance of Freedom," symbolical of Belgium being freed from the Huns, which is to be presented during the evening, and a number of Scotch songs and dances which are to be done by Jean Cameron.

Joseph Hertogs, vice consul for Belgium, will be a patron for the evening. The proceeds from the affair will be given for Belgian relief work.
