Making Families Whole Again
Together, Addiction and Child Welfare Workers Can Restore Hope pg. 16

Better Aftercare for the Dually Diagnosed pg. 22
Do School and Recovery Mix? pg. 27
Speaking for the Cause pg. 33
Table of Contents

Departments

4 Letter from the Editor
Screening day helps demystify alcohol problems.

6 Letters
The debate continues over the merits of harm reduction strategies.

8 Commentary
It's important to distinguish facts from hearsay when discussing marijuana's effects.
By Carlton K. Erickson, Ph.D.

10 Advocacy
In the second of a three-part series on substance abuse parity initiatives, the author discusses a fleeting moment when the advocacy community seemed at the top of its game.
By Carol McDaid

51 CE Quiz
Earn continuing education credits; this issue's quiz is tied to the cover story on page 16.

52 Letter from the Publisher
Paying tribute to the community we're building; chronicling a journey to recovery

55 Opiate Addiction
On many occasions, physical dependency to opiates does not come with concurrent psychological issues, argues the medical director of the Weismann Institute in California. He discusses his organization's medical alternative to traditional detoxification and treatment.

59 Roadblocks to Recovery
If you observe a client behavior that you believe needs to be changed, perhaps it's best to stop and think before saying something. What you consider a problem may simply be a client preference.
By Nicholas A. Roes, Ph.D.

61 Book Review
A workbook from Hazelden Publishing and Educational Services can help clinicians working with young people who have co-occurring mood and substance use disorders. Other treatment resources from Hazelden are also listed.
By Gaye Enos

Features

COVER STORY:

16 Addiction and Child Welfare Professionals: The Makings of a Healthy Partnership
One is single-mindedly devoted to client recovery; the other completely focused on the safety of the child. Combine their efforts into an integrated approach, and troubles families may see significant benefits.

22 Understanding Co-Occurring Disorders: Helping Clients Succeed in and After Treatment
The post-discharge period is critical for the dually diagnosed client, placed in a position of managing multiple illnesses. Editorial advisory board member Diane Snow discusses the plans, supports and contingencies needed to improve the chances for success.

27 The Intersection of Treatment and Education for the Young Addict
Young people in addiction treatment may want to advance their education, but many need to erase negative experiences they have had as students. The director of a Georgia treatment program that operates an accredited high school discusses ways to integrate education into treatment without losing sight of the primary goal of recovery.

33 Who Should Speak for the Cause?
Addiction is a field in constant search of a public face. Oftentimes it embraces the high-profile person willing to speak for the cause. But is the type of messenger as important as the message? And what makes people like Florida’s first lady get involved?
By Colleen Fitzpatrick

40 Dialectical Behavioral Therapy: A Tool for Addiction Treatment
A psychotherapeutic theory designed for the treatment of borderline personality disorder includes important skills-building elements that work well for addiction treatment, according to an Illinois addiction counselor.

46 The Public Health Case for Needle Exchange Programs: A California Perspective
The dual scourges of HIV/AIDS and hepatitis C offer reason enough for health professionals to advocate the establishment of needle exchange programs, argue experts from the University of California San Francisco-Fresno.