

MI Training and Assessment Study

Motivational interviewing (MI) is a widely used counseling approach that has been supported by research. The University of Washington is seeking providers of mental health and chemical dependency services (e.g., counselors, nurses, social workers, psychologists, psychiatrists, residents, fellows, post-docs) to participate in a study about the measurement of Motivational Interviewing skills.

Participants will:

Be paid up to $100 to complete online questionnaires, video exams, and an audiotaped interview with a project staff person ($40 each plus a $20 completion bonus). Each of the two assessments can be completed from home or the workplace. The first assessment should take no more than 90 minutes for both the online and telephone portions and the second assessment should take less than an hour.

To be eligible, providers must work at least half time in a clinical setting dealing with issues of mental health or substance use.
