ProSeed: Take Hackathon, the biggest event as an example, there were 40 international graduate students out of 100 participants, 65-70 of them were graduate students. This year, a startup based in Seattle, Dev Match, is attending, whose CEO is an alumni from Foster School of Business.

Peter: For events like hackathon, is it possible to open up to other avenues like software products, hardware products, or other entrepreneurial products?

ProSeed: Yes. For example, this year's presentation will be structured into 2 parts where the first one focuses on the strategy part of the startup and the second part mainly focuses on the technical part. The event will be a combination of entrepreneurship and technical aspects.
