Chair, HPRC Community Advisory Board

Nurturing a Passion for Service

The son of an Army First Sergeant, George Dicks considers his experience as a military child the most formative of his life. "It was an eye-opening experience for me. What an amazing adventure I had," George says. "As opposed to many African American kids from the south, I got to travel the world, had a fantastic education, and developed a valuable sense of myself." Living in places as varied as Georgia, North Carolina, Germany, and New York gave him an interesting perspective on communities, economics, and social dynamics.

An Interest in Human Behavior

George feels lucky to have had very involved grandparents and great-grandparents who influenced his future work with elders. Education was greatly valued in George's family, whose members include college presidents, university deans, attorneys, and a federal judge, among other inspiring achievers. George began college in Augusta, Georgia, as a business major, but quickly learned that was not where his heart was. "Because I had observed all kinds of people over time, psychology became fascinating to me; human thought, human thinking, human behavior—that became my thing." George's experience with philosophy and German mythology was a good complement to the psychological literature he studied to obtain his degree.

George's firsthand observation of the effects of family members' substance abuse had a memorable influence on his early career. After college, he worked as a drug counselor for the Army in Virginia for three years. "We created one of the early peer group structures for Army officers with addiction issues." Five years later, George packed up his Renault Le Car and moved to Washington state. He worked at Harborview with inpatients for a couple years, then at Boeing to "try something different—however, it was not fulfilling and definitely bad for my health." When a new Geriatric Mental Health unit at Harborview Medical Center opened up, George was hired to join the founding team. He has now happily served at Harborview as a Mental Health Practitioner for 35 years. More >

PEARLS Connect Study Update

There is strong evidence that PEARLS (Program to Encourage Active, Rewarding Lives) is an effective model to treat late-life depression in low-income older adults with multiple chronic conditions. Our new PEARLS Connect study, funded by the AARP Foundation, is working to evaluate whether PEARLS is also effective for reducing social isolation in older adults. Read more about the initial phase of the study.

May is Older Americans Month

The Administration on Aging, part of the Administration for Community Living, leads the USA's observance of Older Americans Month. The 2018 theme —"Engage at Every Age" —emphasizes that you are never too old (or young) to take part in activities that can enrich your physical, mental, and emotional wellbeing.
