

About Our Graduate Program

We encourage you to explore our program with its eight major areas of focus within psychology.

Animal Behavior | Behavioral Neuroscience

General Clinical* | Child Clinical*

Cognition & Perception | Developmental

Social Psychology & Personality | Quantitative

Students in any of these areas may supplement their training with coursework in such specialties as Diversity Science and/or Quantitative Methods.

The goal of our program is to train the researchers and academicians of tomorrow.

This program is not designed for students seeking a terminal Master's degree in Psychology.

Please visit our Department webpage, especially the FAQ for more information and answers to your questions: <http://www.psych.uw.edu/>

**Students trained in either General or Child Clinical Psychology will gain the skills to do research and teach in these areas, but will require additional training in clinical work.*

Note: All applications are reviewed by the faculty in their respective areas before decisions to admit or not admit were made. If an area has no admissions for the current year it usually means that an offer was made but declined; or that the applications available were perceived to be insufficiently competitive or insufficiently compatible with our program. When an individual area has only one or two positions available it reserves the right to hold those positions for a particularly outstanding applicant in the future.

Diversity Admissions (table to immediate left)

The Department relies upon traditional criteria (e.g., GPA, GREs, letters, statement of purpose, etc.) in its evaluation of applicants. However, special consideration is made of students' backgrounds and potentials. As a result, the students admitted to the Department have exhibited a wide range of performance on traditional criteria. We do consider special talents, aptitudes, and abilities, and make an effort to increase the proportion of diverse students.
