Interprofessional Education: Transforming Health Professionals Education at the University of Washington

Patient case takes health care students on an interprofessional learning journey

What is Interprofessional Education (IPE) at the UW?

Interprofessional education (IPE) is defined as when two or more professions learn with, from and about each other to work collaboratively to improve the quality of health care. At the University of Washington, interprofessional education will provide a collaborative approach to teaching and training health professional across our six Health Sciences schools. The UW's interprofessional education will promote a coordinated curriculum, shared classroom experience, team-based practice and cooperative research. The goal is to prepare UW graduates to work in concert with professionals from diverse disciplines dedicated to improving the health and well-being of individuals and communities.

What is UW's IPE Vision?

To be a world leader in training health professionals to address tomorrow's health challenges.

What is the UW's IPE Mission?

The University of Washington Interprofessional Education Initiative (IPE) mission is to advance health for individuals and populations by integrating and transforming the student learning experience across the University of Washington's six Health Sciences schools (Dentistry, Medicine, Nursing, Pharmacy, Public Health, Social Work). By transforming curriculum, facilities, and approaches to training and education among these schools, the UW will better equip our students to meet the emerging challenge of ensuring the well-being of people and populations, locally and globally. The health issues of the 21st century span all the health sciences. To address them, our students, teachers and researchers must bring a team-based, cross-disciplinary, integrative approach to transforming health professionals education at the University of Washington.
